The jury on a murder trial have retired to consider their verdict. The prisoner, a young delinquent, is on trial for the murder of his aggressive father, the case against is extremely and the judge has directed the jury to find the boy guilty if there is no reasonable doubt. Eleven of the jurors, some of them anxious for personal reasons to terminate the case, declare there is no reasonable doubt, but one of them, No. Eight, while far from convinced of the boy's innocence, feels that some of the evidence against him has been ambiguous and that at least there should be some discussion. At the end of a long afternoon he wins all the others round to his view.
